

Research on the Path of Effective Social Work Participation in Grassroots Governance

Daichao Cheng, Huaqiang Liu

Faculty of Law and Public Administration, Yibin University, Yibin 644000, China

Abstract: Social work plays an important role in the field of grassroots governance, and plays an increasingly important role in providing professional services, promoting community development, participating in public affairs, and promoting social equity. In the context of promoting the modernization of grass-roots governance, by establishing an effective communication mechanism, strengthening professional training, innovative service models and strengthening cooperation with other fields, social work can better participate in grassroots governance and improve governance efficiency.

Key words: social work; Grassroots governance; Professional services

I. Introduction

With the development and progress of society, grass-roots governance has become an important field of social development. Grassroots governance involves many aspects such as community construction, improvement of residents' well-being and government management. It is a process that requires multi-party participation and cooperation to achieve social harmony, stability and sustainable development. As an important part of the social service system, social work is playing an increasingly important role in grassroots governance. However, how to effectively participate in grassroots governance and improve the efficiency and effectiveness of governance has always been a hot issue in the field of social work. This paper aims to explore the path for social work to effectively participate in grassroots governance and provide reference for promoting the modernization of grassroots governance.

II. The role of social work in grassroots governance

1. Providing specialized services

Social work plays an important role in grassroots governance, which provides an effective way to solve problems in grassroots governance by providing professional services. Specifically, the professional services provided by social work mainly cover the following aspects: First, psychological counseling. In grassroots governance, we often encounter various psychological problems, such as family conflicts, work pressure, community relations and so on. By providing psychological counseling, social work agencies provide psychological support and help to community residents, relieve their psychological pressure and promote community harmony and stability. Second, educational counseling. Through educational counseling, social work organizations can help community residents improve their knowledge and enhance their self-development and problem-solving abilities. For community residents of different ages and with different needs, various forms of educational counseling can be carried out, such as adult education, children's education, skill training, etc. Third, rehabilitation training. For community residents with physical or mental disabilities or obstacles, social work organizations can help them recover their physical functions and improve their quality of life through rehabilitation training. At the same time, rehabilitation training can also enhance community residents' self-cognition and self-management ability, and promote their integration into society.

2. Promoting community development

Social work plays an important role in promoting community development. Community is the basic unit of grass-roots governance, and its development level directly affects the effectiveness of grass-roots governance and the quality of life and happiness of community residents. Social work actively participates in and promotes the development of the community in the following ways: First, it organizes community activities. By planning and organizing various forms of community activities, such as artistic performances, sports competitions, knowledge lectures, etc., social work agencies enrich the cultural life of community residents and enhance the cohesion and vitality of the community. These activities not only provide a platform for community residents to communicate and interact, but also help cultivate their sense of belonging and participation in the community. Second, promote community exchanges. Through visits, seminars, questionnaires and other means, social workers have an in-depth understanding of the needs and problems of community residents, timely collection and processing of residents' opinions and suggestions, and provide more practical services for community residents. At the same time, social workers also actively promote exchanges and communication among community residents, help residents to establish a good neighborhood relationship and create a harmonious community atmosphere.

3. Participating in public affairs

Social work promotes fairness and justice in public services by participating in decision-making and overseeing the implementation of public policies. First, social work agencies and workers can provide professional advice and opinions to the government and decision-making bodies by participating in decision-making on public affairs. They can make use of their professional knowledge and experience to evaluate and consult on policy making to ensure that policies are scientific and fair. At the same time, social workers can actively promote public participation, encourage community residents and relevant stakeholders to participate in the decision-making process, and ensure the representativeness and universality of policies. Secondly, social work ensures the effective implementation and fair distribution of public policies by supervising their implementation. They can cooperate with government departments to supervise and evaluate the policy implementation process, identify problems and deficiencies in a timely manner, and propose suggestions for improvement. In addition, social workers can provide support and assistance to vulnerable groups and ensure that they can equally enjoy the benefits brought about by public policies. In the process of participating in public affairs, social work also focuses on cooperation and coordination with other fields. They can work together with government departments, non-governmental organizations, community organizations and other forces to form synergy and promote the smooth development of public affairs. At the same time, social work also focuses on communication and exchange with the media, the public and other parties, responding to social concerns in a timely manner, and enhancing the transparency and credibility of public affairs. In short, social work has made important contributions to promoting fairness and justice in public services by participating in decision-making on public affairs and supervising the implementation of public policies.

4. Promoting social equity

Social equity is the cornerstone of social development and an important guarantee for social harmony and stability. Social work actively promotes the realization of social equity by paying attention to vulnerable groups and promoting social equity and justice. First of all, social work pays attention to vulnerable groups and provides them with targeted services. Vulnerable groups are often disadvantaged in the distribution of social resources, education, employment and other aspects, and are vulnerable to unfair treatment. Through in-depth understanding of the needs and problems of vulnerable groups, social work agencies and workers provide them with psychological support, educational counseling, rehabilitation training and other services to help them overcome difficulties, improve their ability and achieve self-development. Secondly, social work promotes social equity and justice. Social equity and justice is the core value of social development and an important guarantee for social harmony and stability. Social work organizations and workers ensure the fairness and fairness of policies by participating in decision-making of public affairs and supervising the implementation of public policies. They actively advocate the concept of social equity and justice, urge all sectors of society to pay attention to the rights and interests of vulnerable groups, and strive for equal opportunities and resources for them. In addition, social work also focuses on promoting equal opportunities. Equality of opportunity is an important prerequisite for social equity. Social work organizations and workers provide equal development opportunities for all people through measures such as promoting equality in education and employment. They advocate the elimination of discrimination, the breaking down of barriers and the creation of equal conditions for everyone to participate in social competition.

III. Ways for social work to effectively participate in grassroots governance

1. Establish an effective communication mechanism

In grassroots governance, effective communication mechanisms are key to effective participation in social work. The establishment of an effective communication mechanism can promote the exchange of information and feedback of opinions between social work and grass-roots governments, community residents and other parties, and improve the efficiency and effectiveness of governance. First of all, social work agencies should keep close contact with grassroots governments, keep abreast of the government's policy direction and needs, and provide professional suggestions and opinions to the government. At the same time, social work agencies should also feed back the needs and problems of community residents to the government in a timely manner to provide references for government decision-making. Secondly, social work agencies should establish good communication channels with community residents to understand their needs and problems and provide them with targeted services. Collect opinions and suggestions from community residents through regular forums and questionnaire surveys, and adjust service content and methods in a timely manner to improve service quality and satisfaction. In addition, social work agencies should also maintain communication and cooperation with other social organizations and stakeholders to jointly solve problems in grassroots governance. Through cooperation with the media and ngos, they should strengthen information sharing and resource integration, so as to form a joint force to promote the development of grassroots governance. By establishing an effective communication mechanism, social work can better understand the needs and problems of grassroots governance and provide targeted services to the government and all sectors of society.

2. Strengthen professional training

As a highly professional discipline, social work needs to continuously strengthen professional training to improve the professional quality and service ability of social workers. Strengthening professional training is one of the important ways for social work to effectively participate in grassroots governance. First, social work agencies should strengthen professional training for social workers, including theoretical knowledge, practical skills and communication skills. Regular training courses, seminars and practical exercises should be held to improve the professional quality and service ability of social workers. Meanwhile, social workers are encouraged to participate in professional training and academic exchange activities at home and abroad to broaden their horizons and learn advanced experiences and practices. Second, social work agencies should carry out special training and research on problems in grassroots governance. Through in-depth understanding of the needs and problems of grassroots governance, combined with the actual situation, targeted training and research should be carried out to improve the ability and effectiveness of social workers to solve practical problems. In addition, social work agencies should also strengthen publicity and education for community residents to improve their cognition and trust in social work. Through publicity activities and public lectures, the concepts and methods of social work should be popularized among community residents, so as to enhance their recognition and support for social work.

3. Innovate service models

With the development of society and the changing needs of grassroots governance, the traditional service model has been unable to meet the needs of community residents. Therefore, social work agencies need to constantly innovate their service models to adapt to the new situation and needs. First of all, social work agencies can learn from advanced service models at home and abroad and carry out localized transformation according to the actual situation. For example, they can learn from the international project-based operation model of social work, and improve the pertinence and effectiveness of social work through project design, implementation and evaluation. At the same time, we can also learn from the theory of community development to promote the self-development and self-management of community residents. Secondly, social work agencies can actively explore new service areas and ways. For example, online services and remote services can be developed to provide more convenient and efficient services for community residents. At the same time, it can also pay attention to the needs of special groups and vulnerable groups, carry out targeted service projects, and improve the coverage and pertinence of services. In addition, social work agencies can also actively cooperate with the government, enterprises, social organizations and other forces to jointly promote the development of grassroots governance. Through cooperation, they can integrate resources, share information and form joint forces to improve the efficiency and effectiveness of grassroots governance.

4. Strengthen cooperation with other areas

Social work is not isolated in grassroots governance; it needs to work closely with other areas to jointly solve governance problems and improve overall governance effectiveness. Such cooperation can not only integrate the resources of all parties, but also promote cross-border exchanges and collaboration, form synergy, and promote the in-depth development of grassroots governance. First of all, cooperation between social work and education is of utmost importance. Education is the foundation of grassroots governance, through which the quality of citizens can be cultivated and the degree of civilization of communities can be improved. Social work may cooperate with educational institutions to carry out civic education, community education and other activities to improve the quality of community residents and their awareness of participation. At the same time, social work can also provide a social practice base for educational institutions to help students understand community needs and cultivate their sense of social responsibility. Secondly, the cooperation between social work and the medical field is also indispensable. Health is an important aspect of grass-roots governance, and the health rights and interests of community residents can be safeguarded through medical security. Social work may cooperate with medical institutions to provide services such as health consultation and rehabilitation training for community residents to improve their health. At the same time, social work can also focus on mental health issues and provide psychological counseling and support for community residents. In addition, social work can cooperate with other fields such as environmental protection and culture. For example, it can cooperate with environmental protection agencies to carry out environmental protection activities and raise the environmental awareness of community residents; And cooperate with cultural institutions to carry out cultural activities to enrich the cultural life of community residents. Such cooperation will help promote the overall development and progress of grassroots governance.

References:

- [1] Yingsheng Li. Research on Social Work in the New Journey of Chinese Modernization [J]. Research on Socialism with Chinese Characteristics, 2023, (01): 12-19.
- [2] Weiwei Yang, Shengli Guo, Leidong Wei. Evolution, change and motivation: An analysis of the institutional innovation process of social Work participation in grassroots governance [J]. Journal of Gansu Administration College, 2022, (05): 16-30.
- [3] Wenjing Li. Function Reflection and optimization path of Social Work in community governance [J]. Exploration, 2023, (02): 152-162.

Fund Project: Yibin University Cultivation Project “Social Work ‘Effective Participation’ in grassroots social governance status and path Research” (Project No. : 2022PY12)